

Killed by Performing Tigers.
[London Telegraph.]

Scarcely three months have elapsed since we recorded the horrible fate of Karoly, the renowned Hungarian wild beast tamer, during one of his sensational performances with a huge boa-constrictor, by which he was crushed to death while enveloped in its coils. We now learn that another tragedy of this class has been enacted at Berlin. William Rice, the "tiger king," brother-in-law of Hagenbeck, who is well known throughout Europe as the impresario of Nubian caravans and Zulu "troupes," opened a "zoological-anthropological museum" a few days ago in the Tiergarten, just outside the Brandenburger Thor. This "museum," as its title denotes, contained a collection of rare animals and a variety of more or less savage men and women who had been trained by Rice to go through elaborate performances with disciplined carnivora. Among others was an extraordinary handsome young negro, who was announced to appear in a "thrilling scene of action with three full grown Bengal tigers. On the opening night the "museum" being crowded with an eagerly expectant audience, the curtain rose upon a huge cage, into which Rice proceeded to lead the tigers, preparatory to "Black Helen's" performance. Scarcely had he made his obsequies to the public when one of the ferocious animals sprang upon him, struck him on the right cheek with his left forepaw and fastened with its tremendous fangs upon the muscles of his left arm. One of the attendants, also an Englishman, rushed to his assistance, armed with a heavy iron bar, and beat the tiger off. Rice walked steadily off the stage, and fell into a swoon as soon as he had reached the wing. Professor Von Langenbeck, the Emperor's body surgeon, and Virchow, the eminent anatomist, were summoned, and dressed the unfortunate man's wounds. He was removed to Langenbeck's private infirmary, where he received the personal and unremitting attention of Germany's first living surgeon; but the shock to his system was so terrible that at last he died in great agony. The immediate cause of his death is officially stated to be blood poisoning. "Black Helen," whose real name is Helen Johnson, a native of New Jersey, was also bitten by a lion during the performance that took place on the evening after Rice's mishap, and lies in a precarious condition. The Berlin police authorities have closed the "museum" and prohibited any further exhibitions of wild beast taming within the precincts of the German capital.

A European correspondent of The Occident says that Mr. Falconer, who died last month, made $100,000 by the "Deep o' Day," which ran two years at the Lyceum. Up to that time he had been a struggling provincial actor, and by embarking his capital in redecorating and running Drury Lane with a piece called "Bonny Dundee," an utter failure, he lost all. The correspondent adds that "Old Drury" effectually cleans out every manager who tackles her.

A GREAT novelty, which can at present only be obtained at one Parisian house, is the cuirass Veronese. This cuirass is of silk elastic material, manufactured expressly for this purpose, and having the appearance of heavy faille or glace silk. The secret of this waist is that it fits into the figure over the bust and hips without a crease. It is worn without a belt. This is most beautiful style, and will likely soon be in general favor.

See without fail the lib-lib offer of Moore & Wilson, publishers of "The Cricket on the Hearth," in this issue. We know them to be entirely responsible.
